Male Chauvinist Monkeys Are Here

Four squirrel monkeys from Peru are currently enjoying a new life at Georgia College. And a new view of the entire world.

Before being brought here for research in animal behavior, the monkeys were part of a colony of 28 at the University of Georgia where they were held in cages in a room without windows and where they were being used in research on contraceptive measures.

Here at Georgia College, the monkeys are kept in cages near a wall-size window which is used by the biology teachers to watch the monkeys and keep track of them. Dr. David Shatzer, assistant professor of biology, says that the monkeys are the keepers of the colony. Their first reaction to a human and cage cleaner almost ended in disaster. Open the cage, any one, but not gingerly enough, the biology teachers and all watching their movements escape with surprise and shock. Only a tray of fishing net in the trunk of his car saved the day.

According to Dr. Shatzer, only one female can be handled and this must be done with some care. Recently he found the female a few seconds too long and was bitten on the hand that he had just given her. Dr. Shatzer then got back to the cage and received a formal tract.

Primates are extremely nervous, according to Dr. Shatzer. These primates are extremely nervous and protective, and will constantly station themselves between a female and anyone attempting to open the cage.

At meal time, there’s no doubt who gets to eat first, says Dr. Shatzer. "It’s the male monkey’s time."

The meals generally consist of monkey chow (like dry dog food) several times a day the vitamin and fruit once a day. The monkeys now know who gives them fruit and have a "show call" all their own, according to the GC teacher. Other sounds discernible to those closest to monkeys are a "hoo hoo" and "huf huf" sound when the animals are happy, a chatter when they are mad, and a scream or howl of distress.

The monkeys are used in studies of dominance, sexual behavior, and food preference and possibility in mental health. Primates do not make good pets, says Dr. Shatzer, who feels that the sale of monkeys to an unsuspecting public is "the greatest ripoff of all."

Primates are really messy animals, he says, and "to my knowledge, no one has ever trained or trained a monkey."

"Who’s more primates are difficult to handle, and the larger ones are strong enough to overpower a person."

"An adult human is not normally a match for a large chimpanzee," he says. So the thought that you can purchase your pet monkey.

Wanderings

The music plays in your mind. Thoughts of food every other day. I need my body back in time. Surrounding noise. It is as though you were really here. I can see you, everything seems real. Once, my darling, sometimes I feel real.

All too often, stage plays with great stories, music, and superior production turn into disasters when transferred to the screen. This has been the case with a number of major stage plays transferred recently. The most outstanding example of this is the recent GREAT WALLACE. On the other hand, there are plays which are transferred to the screen quite successfully. SLEUTH is an excellent example of the latter case. SLEUTH, based on the Thomas Mann award-winning play, stars the incomparable acting duo of Laurence Olivier and Michael Caine, and is directed by the accomplished Joseph L. Mankiewicz. Anthony Shaffer's thriller-comedy-screenplay is smart and engaging.

"SLEUTH" is a classic mystery story, and is a treat for anyone who likes mystery, suspense, anyone who likes smart writing and elaborate scenes. The highly-anticipated part of the play is difficult to describe without giving away the plot lines. Anyone who has not seen the play should not read further. In a word of advice for those who haven't seen it yet: Don't let anything spoil the mystery and suspense, make sure you see it from the beginning.

Desideri (Peter O'Toole), a man with a vivid mind and a Nobel Prize-winning brain, decides to use his skills to find a young woman named Rivia (Michael Caine) for an evening of `talking with the dead'. SLEUTH is an exciting example of the latter type of suspense story.

To whom it may concern:

The world is an apple of many people's eye,
but rotten to the core.
Poetry is the core of the world.
It makes the victors and the worms
and with pretty words say it beautifully.

MEY
7-16-71

Once upon a time
in a star-struck dust
I stood up and reached for what I wanted
but returned with a hand full of empty air
and trivial invisible tears in my head.
I realize now that the world is mine
I can conquer it
in a day, or a year,
even better a life time.
